

home inspector's website and review sample reports to get a sense of what the client is buying. Further, they should ensure that the inspection reports provide detailed descriptions, photos, and videos that clearly and concisely state what the issues are without using overly complex language. The reports should create clarity, not confusion.

Agents can remind clients that inspectors can inspect only those items that are readily observable and accessible. If they can't see it, they can't inspect it. Simply put, the professional home inspection is a visual, non-invasive inspection that reports on the home's condition at the time of the inspection - a "snapshot in time."

REALTORS® and their clients may also want to ask if the home inspection company uses advanced tools such as drones or thermal imaging cameras and if they are certified or adequately trained in using those tools. For example, if drones are used, Chris and Mark stated that the drone operators must be FAA certified, and if the inspector uses thermal imaging cameras, the inspector should have received training on how to use the cameras appropriately and how to read and interpret the results. Mark and Chris said that many inspectors improperly use these advanced tools, which hurts their clients.

The final consideration when finding the best inspection company is the cost. Since Colorado is a non-licensing state, the old adage "you get what you pay for" is very true in the inspection industry. Instead of focusing solely on cost, Chris and Mark recommend considering value and quality of service. Those who have not taken the steps to get adequately trained and properly certified are usually the least expensive. In an unregulated industry, cheaper is almost always not better. REALTORS® should remind their clients that they are paying for experience and expertise, which helps them better understand what they are investing in so that they can make a knowledgeable investment.

What the REALTOR® Can Do to Prepare the Buyer for the Inspection
An important step real estate professionals can take to limit aggravations during the home inspection process is to prepare the buyer for the inspection. This includes setting realistic expectations regarding what the inspectors will focus on: major concerns, functionality, and safety issues. The intent of the home inspection is to put the client in a better position to make an informed buying decision, not to identify every little detail or deficiency in the home. The client should understand that normal wear and tear is expected and will not be included in the inspection report. In addition, unless paid for as an ancillary service, mold and air quality testing are not part of a standard home inspection. Agents can remind clients that inspectors can inspect only those items that are readily observable and accessible. If they can't see it, they can't inspect it. Simply put, the professional home inspection is a visual, non-invasive inspection that reports on the home's condition at the time of the inspection - a "snapshot in time."

Additionally, it is important that the client understands that home inspectors are "generalists," meaning they know enough to know who to call in for the major issues and will defer to those experts and licensed professionals. Finally, REALTORS® should encourage their clients to review the entire report, contact the inspection company if they have any questions about the findings, and follow up on any recommendations.

Another critical step real estate professionals can take to prepare the buyer for the inspection is to remind them that it is not a code-compliance inspection. The overall goal of the inspection is to identify any major concerns and ensure the home's systems and components are functioning properly and safely. Because building codes change frequently, it is not reasonable or feasible to expect a seller to make a home built in 1962 comply with current building standards. Mark and Chris shared this example: If the house is older and full of two-pronged outlets, it may not comply with today's electrical codes but may still be safe.

What the REALTOR® Can Do to Prepare the Seller for the Inspection

Chris and Mark also want to remind REALTORS® to prepare the seller for the inspection. The national average time for a quality inspection is two-and-a-half to three-and-a-half hours. A quality inspector can shave some of that time off, but generally not much. Rarely will a quality inspection be done in less than two hours, and if this promise is made to the sellers, they may feel frustrated when they come home to find the inspector still there. They recommend that REALTORS® tell the seller it will take longer than expected to negate that frustration.

Addressing Issues After the Inspection

If questions or concerns arise, REALTORS® are encouraged to remind their clients to follow the inspection agreement they have in place with the inspector and to have the client contact the inspector directly. The inspector works for the client and has an agreement with the client, not with the real estate agent. When anyone other than the inspector and client is involved, it can create unnecessary confusion and complications.

A Special Note on Meth Testing

Meth testing is prone to high error rates and significant liability and Colorado law requires any contractor that does meth testing to be a licensed industrial hygienist. As a result, most inspectors should not be offering meth testing as an ancillary service, unless they are a licensed industrial hygienist. Instead, Mark and Chris recommend referring that work to a vendor holding that credential.

Beware of Home Warranties or Guarantees

Some companies offer home warranties in conjunction with the home inspection. Generally, those warranties are provided by third-party companies that often find reasons for not honoring a warranty claim. Two of the more common reasons for denying a warranty claim can include the age of the appliance or system or the appliance or system being outside the scope of the general home inspection.

To combat this issue, Mark's company brought this service in-house, offering certain guarantees with every inspection at no additional cost to clients. For example, Brick and Mortar Home Inspections, Inc. offers a 100-day guarantee on mechanical equipment and all built-in appliances. Should a client experience an issue with an appliance within 100 days of the inspection, Brick and Mortar Home Inspections will pay to have a qualified contractor make the necessary repair, even if that appliance was functioning properly at the time of the inspection. Brick and Mortar offers this program because it aligns with one of their core values: "We believe we have a duty to help others." Mark states that Brick and Mortar's long-lasting relationships with an extensive list of trades professionals enable them to offer this service to their clients.

Leading with Passion and Care

In closing, Mark and Chris clearly show why they are leaders in the home inspection industry. Their respect for REALTORS®, clients, and each other is apparent and exemplary. Their passion for excellence is evident in how they operate their businesses and strive to be the best in the industry. Companies like these that do it the right way should be at the top of every real estate professional's referral list.
